with sensitive eyes. She cradled me against her chest and said, "Oh, thank you, Venerables! I love her." Then I was almost crushed, as she leaped into the arms of an elderly gentleman sitting in an overstuffed armchair.

"Please tell me the Hitty story again!" she cried.

The man hugged her tight, then replied, "Certainly, my dear. I am sure your new doll would like to know how she came into existence. Have a about her. "Yes, Mekitty, I meant you. But let me finish. After that, the Van Renselaers said their goodbyes, but that little doll made an impression on me." Charles Dickens' deeply lined face suddenly broke into a smile.

"After I returned to England from my American tour, I

It may have been the ink drying, but I suddenly felt a chill travel up my spine. I had no idea at the time that this was the beginning of a series of adventures which would one day lead to finding my sister Hitty doll, the one Charles Dickens had described so well. It was she who inspired me to set down these memoirs... but I am getting ahead of myself. Let me start at the beginning and tell of those early days with Mekitty. To Rachel Field and Charles Dickens: whose works of fiction have brought joy to millions of people.

curls under her little white hat, embellished with a red feather. She quickly overcame her shock and said, 'Her name is Hitty.'

"I gave her a polite bow and then delivered the doll into her eager hands. 'And what is your name, my dear?' I asked. "'Isabella Van Rensselaer,' she replied. I then turned to the gentleman standing next to her. 'Then you must be Mr. Van Rensselaer.' "He held out his gloved hand

"Excellent idea, my dear." And with that, he stood up and strode towards a desk sitting in a bay window across the room. "Bring her to me, and I shall write her name on her back." Mekity practically skipped to the desk. She quickly unbuttoned and removed my green silk paletot, a sort of overcoat which was worn at the time, and my cotton chemise, but she left my matching striped skirt and petticoat in place. Then she reached up towards seat here with me." The little girl snuggled into his lap, still holding me tight.

"It was a cold December morning in New York," he began as he absent-mindedly stroked his beard. "I was staying at the Brevoort House, a fine hotel with at least 500 bedrooms. couldn't stop thinking about Hitty. Since you liked her story so much, I knew a doll would be the perfect birthday present for you.

"Would you believe this little doll took a skilled woodworker a whole week to carve? He used a lathe to make the body, and do you see the way her arms and legs are pegged, so that she can move them?" he said as he demonstrated by turning my arms and legs. "But I improved the design by making the arms her grandfather, and I could feel myself enveloped in the warm hand of the great Charless Dickens, although at the time I had no idea of his importance. With his right hand, he dipped his goose quill pen into a glass inkwell, and with care and precision, began to write the letters K-I-T-T-Y on my back. I could feel the light scratching of the quill pen and the coldness of the ink as it seeped into the grain of my sturdy oak body.
